

New partnership with American sustainability leader Ampleen

Response to a growing number of companies seeking help to meet and report on CSR and sustainability goals

Tennaxia, has formed a partnership in the U.S. with Ampleen, a corporate consulting firm that helps clients embrace sustainability through its advisory services. The partnership will offer both technology, services and training for companies looking to improve, scale up or streamline their efforts in this evolving field.

Our collaboration with Ampleen began informally two years ago. We focus on helping the growing number of companies that need to meet and report on accepted sustainability standards. We also help companies aligning sustainability and core business objectives.

The fruit of our partnership: an expanding range of services

“We have connected with Ampleen because they bring a range of important services to clients,” Juliette Barre, Sustainability Principal at Tennaxia North America says. Noting that the firm has worked for such clients as:

- New York State Restaurant Association
- Great Eastern Energy
- Solar One
- Greenwich House

They focus on helping organizations develop and implement complete and robust sustainability programs. These are based on the three CSR’s pillars: people, profit and planet.

Specialties include sustainability accounting and reporting as well as employee engagement. They are designed to maximize a company’s sustainability and CSR effort. To do that, they create a “culture of purpose” and deliver measurable results.

“Together, we offer everything sustainability managers will need for measurement, compliance and analysis, including tailored software and hands-on strategy, support and training services,” says Barre. “We know many sustainability leaders in the U.S. are increasingly interested in this combination of technologies and services.”

Addressing sustainability in a new era

“Even though regulations may be cut by the new administration in Washington, sustainability here and around the globe is still a critical goal,” says Ampleen’s principal of environmental programs Jennifer Dudgeon. She has broad experience in sustainability management, consulting and research for companies in the U.S and abroad.

“On the first hand, consumers, investors and business partners increasingly want companies to be active and transparent. On the second hand, governments, especially in Europe, still have stringent regulations that need to be adhered to,” she explains.

“For mid-to-large sized companies with multiple sites that are relatively new to reporting, collecting accurate and comprehensive data can be a challenge. However, it will be required,” Dudgeon says. “Because we understand and anticipate the pain points, we can help companies that need to employ dedicated software tools and services. Those are specifically geared for global data collection, CSR reporting requirements, and performance goals.”

About Ampleen

Ampleen is a sustainability consulting firm based in New York City. First, it started off as an information-sharing platform on urban green living and environmental and lifestyle sustainability. Then it expanded its offerings to include employee engagement and training. The firm’s programs are underscored by the more than 15 years of experience of Ampleen’s trainers and consultants. For more information, visit: www.ampleen.com